STATE OF FLORIDA, ex rel. JANET RENO, as State Attorney for the Eleventh Judicial Circuit of Florida, Respondent.

OPINION BELOW

The opinion of the Supreme Court of Florida is reported at 494 So.2d 214 (1986). It approved and adopted the opinion of this District Court of Appeal of Florida in Ferre v. State, 478 So.2d 1077 (Fla. 3d DCA 1985). Both opinions are reprinted in the Appendix.[1]

JURISDICTION

The decision of the Supreme Court of Florida was rendered on September 18, 1986. This Court granted an extension of time until February 17, 1987 for filing a Petition for Writ of Certiorari to review that opinion. This Petition has been filed within the prescribed time.

The jurisdiction of this Court is invoked under Title 28 U.S.C. §1257(3).

CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISION INVOLVED

AMENDMENT I

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

[1]The parties to the proceeding below are the same parties named in the caption of this Petition: Maurice Ferre and the State of Florida, acting through the State Attorney for the Eleventh Judicial Circuit, Janet Reno.

AMENDMENT XIV

. . . nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty or property without due process of law.

STATUTORY PROVISIONS INVOLVED

FLORIDA STATUTES
Section 106.141(10)

Any candidate, or any person on behalf of a candidate, who accepts contributions after such candidate has withdrawn his candidacy, after the candidate has been eliminated as a candidate or elected to office, or after the second anniversary of the date the campaign account of such candidate was established, is guilty of a misdemeanor of the first degree, punishable as provided in s. 775.082 or s. 775.083.

FLORIDA STATUTES

Any contribution received by a candidate with opposition in an election or the campaign treasurer or a deputy treasurer of such candidate, or by the treasurer or a deputy treasurer of a political committee supporting or opposing a candidate with opposition or supporting or opposing an issue on the ballot in an election, on the day of that election or less than 5 days prior to the day of that election shall be returned by him to the person or political committee contributing it and shall not be used or expended by or on behalf of the candidate or political commmittee. Any contribution received by a candidate or the campaign treasurer or a deputy treasurer of a candidate after the date at which the candidate withdraws his candidacy, or after the date the candidate is defeated or elected to office, shall be returned to the person or political committee contributing it and shall not be used or expended by or on behalf of the candidate.

FLORIDA STATUTES
Section 106.08(5)

Any person who knowingly and willfully violates the provisions of this section shall, in addition to any other penalty prescribed by this chapter, pay to the state a sum equal to twice the amount contributed in violation of this chapter. Each campaign treasurer shall pay all amounts contributed in violation of this section to the state for deposit in the General Revenue Fund.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

Maurice Ferre was re-elected as Mayor of Miami, Florida in November, 1981. Following his re-election he accepted and retained $35,000 in campaign contributions. App. 2.

Florida Statute §106.141(10) prohibits a candidate from accepting "contributions after such candidate has withdrawn his candidacy, after the candidate has been elimited as a candidate or [after the candidate has been] elected to office. . . ."

Florida Statute §106.08(2) prohibits acceptance and retention of campaign contributions received "on the day of [the] election or less than 5 days prior to the day of the election."

The State of Florida, through the State Attorney for Dade County, Florida, initiated a civil action to enforce the statutes, seeking the statutory remedy (§106.08(5), Fla. Stat.) of a penalty in twice the amount received by Mayor Ferre.

Ferre responded by contending that the statutes violated his First Amendment rights by infringing upon his free exercise of political speech. The trial court granted summary judgment to the State. Ferre appealed, again raising his First Amendment arguments.[2] The Florida District Court of Appeal rejected the arguments, concluding:

> We think it clear that the challenged statutes are reasonably designed to maximize the distribution of information by allowing the public to be aware of a candidate's financial supporters at a time when such awareness can have an impact on the polls, and reduce the potential for corruption and the appearance of > corruption by removing the possibility of the giving of a post-election contribution in return for a political quid pro quo. When we weigh these compelling governmental interests against the minimal impact on First Amendment rights, we can only conclude that the regulations are not constitutionally infirm. App. 9, 10.

The Supreme Court of Florida affirmed, saying only:

> We approve of the well reasoned opinion of Ferre v. State, 478 So.2d 1077 (Fla. 3d DCA 1985), and adopt it in its entirety.

App. 1.

Certiorari is sought to review the questions raised by the decision below.

REASONS FOR GRANTING CERTIORARI

I

THE DECISION BELOW CONFLICTS WITH THE DECISIONS OF THIS COURT WHICH REQUIRE THAT LIMITATIONS UPON FIRST AMENDMENT RIGHTS BE JUSTIFIED BY COMPELLING GOVERNMENTAL INTERESTS AND BE NARROWLY DRAWN, USING THE LEAST RESTRICTIVE ALTERNATIVES TO ACCOMPLISH THE GOVERNMENTAL INTERESTS AT STAKE.

II

THE DECISION BELOW PRESENTS IMPORTANT BUT UNANSWERED FIRST AMENDMENT QUESTIONS WHICH THIS COURT SHOULD DECIDE.

The decision below is founded upon two governmental interests which the Florida appellate courts found to be compelling. The first is "prevention of corruption and the appearance of corruption." App. 7. The second is "the goal of allowing the public to be informed before an election of the identities of persons contributing to the campaign of a particular candidate." App. 8.

Under the decisions of this Court, the latter interest is not a compelling governmental interest, nor do the statutes accomplish the goals articulated by the Florida courts. The former interest is a compelling interest, but it is not accomplished by the statutes in question. We address the reasons for granting certiorari by examining each aspect of the decision below in light of this Court's cases.

A. The Voter Information Governmental Interest Poses Conflict With This Court's Decisions Or Presents An Important And Unanswered Question.

Addressing the voter information interest, the Florida District Court of Appeal wrote:

> In the absence of the challenged statutes, a candidate could conceal the identity of supporters until after the election when it is too late for the revelation to be considered by the voters in casting their ballots.
> App. 8. (footnote omitted)

That possibility, the court below concluded, created a compelling governmental interest.

This Court has never held that voter education is a compelling governmental interest justifying limitations upon campaign contributions.

> We held in Buckley [v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1 (1976)] and reaffirmed in Citizen's Against Rent Control [v. Berkeley, 454 U.S. 290 (1981)] that preventing corruption or the appearance of corruption are the only legitimate and compelling government interests thus far identified for restricting campaign finances.
> Federal Election Commission v. National Conservative Political Action Committee, ____ U.S. ____, 105 S.Ct. 1459 (1985).

The decision of the Florida District Court of Appeal, creating a new compelling governmental interest of voter information or education, thus conflicts with Buckley, Citizen's Against Rent Control and National Conservative Political Action Committee. Or, at the least, the decision below presents an important but unanswered question of whether the interest articulated by the Florida courts is legitimate and compelling.

Buckley did say that disclosure of campaign contributions serves the compelling interest of providing voters with helpful evaluative information. 424 U.S. at 66-67. But Buckley does not stand for the proposition that preclusion of all contributions serves an important governmental interest, especially where such preclusions inhibit robust political discussion in the critical closing moments of a campaign.[3] Cf. Mills v. Alabama, 384 U.S. 214,220 (1966).

B. The Decision Below Conflicts With, Or Poses Questions Unanswered By This Court's Decisions Utilizing Concern For Corruption As A Compelling Governmental Interest.

Buckley invoked the anti-corruption model as a basis for upholding limitations on the amount of contributions, saying:

> To the extent that large contributions are given to secure political quid pro quos from current

[3]The critical nature of the campaign time period is especially strong in the City of Miami because under §§8 and 9 of the City of Miami City Charter, a general municipal election must be held 7 days after the primary, which narrows the field of candidates for the general election. Thus a candidate who is successful in the primary only has two days to fund his general election campaign.

> and potential office holders, the integrity of our system of representative democracy is undermined. . . .
> Buckley, 424 U.S. at 26-27 (emphasis supplied).

No case from this Court concluded that corruption or the appearance of corruption can be prevented by limiting when even small contributions may be received.[4]

By restricting when contributions can be accepted the state has restricted the amount of money which can be spent, ". . . necessarily reduc[ing] the quantity of expression by restricting the number of issues discussed, the depth of their exploration, and the size of the audience reached." Buckley, 424 U.S. at 19 (footnote omitted). But the rule is:

> [W]here at all possible government must curtail speech only to the degree necessary to meet the particular problem at hand and must avoid infringing on speech that does not pose the danger that has prompted regulation.

[4]Florida generally limits campaign contributions to $1000 per candidate per election. §106.08(1), Fla.Stat. The timing restrictions apply to all contributions—from one dollar to one thousand—made less than 5 days before or after an election with regard to post-election contributions. The prohibitions apply to losing as well as winning candidates. It is difficult to see how preventing a losing candidate from accepting post-election contributions to pay off his or her debt can prevent corruption or the appearance of corruption. The loser has no currency, so the quid pro quo analysis is irrelevant there, and is likewise irrelevant insofar as it pertains to small contributions made anytime during or after a campaign.

> Federal Election Commission v. Massachusetts Citizens For Life, ____ U.S. ____, 107 S.Ct. 616, 631 (1986).

Thus, a state must show a compelling interest and that it has employed "means closely drawn to avoid unnecessary abridgment" of First Amendment rights. Buckley, 424 U.S. at 25 (citations omitted).

The statutes in question are not narrowly tailored to serve the anti-corruption purposes articulated below. By not distinguishing between large and small contributors, the statutes sweep too broadly. Buckley, upholding disclosure requirements, makes the point nicely:

> [D]isclosure requirements deter actual corruption and avoid the appearance of corruption by exposing large contributors and expenditures to the light of publicity. This exposure may discourage those who would use money for improper purposes either before or after the election. A public armed with information about a candidate's most generous supporters is better able to detect any post-election special favors that may be given in return.
> Buckley, 424 U.S. at 67 (emphasis supplied).

Indeed, the Florida courts' unprecedented view that regulating when a contribution is received serves anti-corruption purposes is at odds with the accepted view that disclosure is the disinfectant for corruption.

> [W]e note and agree with appellants' concession that disclosure requirements—certainly in most applications—appear to be the least restrictive means of curbing the evils of campaign ignorance and corruption that Congress found to exist.
> Buckley, 424 U.S. at 68 (footnote omitted).

Florida's means are overly restrictive, overly broad and are ill suited to their claimed goal. Since all contributions would ultimately be disclosed under Florida law, corruption or its appearance can be thwarted without limiting when a candidate can raise funds to expend for his or her candidacy.

Expending money for political expression "produce[s] speech at the core of the First Amendment." Federal Election Commission v. National Conservative Political Action Committee, ____ U.S. ____, 105 S.Ct. at 1467, quoting Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. at 14. Since Florida Statutes §§106.141(10) and 106.08(5) do not "meet the particular problem at hand" and use "too blunt an instrument for [their] delicate task", Federal Election Commission v. Massachusetts Citizens For Life, 107 S.Ct. at 631, they conflict with this Court's decisions demanding carefully tailored statutory restrictions on First Amendment rights. At the least, the decision below presents important constitutional questions which should be answered by this Court.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the Petition for Writ of Certiorari should be granted.

Respectfully submitted,

Maurice FERRE,

v.

The STATE of Florida, ex rel. Janet RENO, as State Attorney of the Eleventh Judicial Circuit, Appellee/Cross-Appellant.

No. 84-2102.

District Court of Appeal of Florida,
Third District.

Aug. 13, 1985.

Before SCHWARTZ, C.J., and DANIEL S. PEARSON and JORGENSON, J.J.

DANIEL S. PEARSON, Judge.

The appellant, Maurice Ferre, is the Mayor of the City of Miami. Following his re-election to that office in November 1981, he accepted and retained $35,000 in the form of 35 post-election contributions of $1,000 each.

Some time later, the State filed a civil complaint against Ferre, in which, as amended, it was alleged that he had accepted and failed to return the $35,000 of post-election contributions in violation of Sections 106.141(10)[1] and 106.08(2)[2], Florida Statutes (1981), respectively. The State asked that the trial court assess a $1,000 civil penalty on account of Ferre's acceptance of the contributions,[3] and a civil penalty of "twice the

[1]Section 106.141(10) provides:

"Any candidate, or any person on behalf of a candidate, who accepts contributions after such candidate has withdrawn his candidacy, after the candidate has been eliminated as a candidate or elected to office, or after the second anniversary of the date the campaign account of such candidate was established, is guilty of a misdemeanor of the first degree, punishable as provided in s. 775.082 or s. 775.083."

[2]Section 106.08(2) provides:

"Any contribution received by a candidate with opposition in an election or the campaign treasurer or a deputy treasurer of such candidate, or by the treasurer or a deputy treasurer of a political committee supporting or opposing a candidate with opposition or supporting or opposing an issue on the ballot in an election, on the day of that election or less than 5 days prior to the day of that election shall be returned by him to the person or political committee contributing it and shall not be used or expended by or on behalf of the candidate or political committee. Any contribution received by a candidate or the campaign treasurer or a deputy treasurer of a candidate after the date at which the candidate withdraws his candidacy, or after the date the candidate is defeated or elected to office, shall be returned to the person or political committee contributing it and shall not be used or expended by or on behalf of the candidate."

amount contributed" on account of Ferre's failure to return the contributions.[4]

Ferre responded by asserting that (1) Florida's statutes prohibiting a candidate for office from accepting post-election contributions and requiring that a candidate who has accepted post-election contributions return them infringe upon his free exercise of political speech and thereby are unconstitutional as violative of rights guaranteed him by the First Amendment to the United States Constitution; (2) the money received by him does not fall within the definition of contributions under the statutes involved; and (3) the mandatory penalty of "twice the amount contributed" set forth in Section 106.08(5) violates the constitutional prohibition against excessive punishment. There being no genuine issue of material fact requiring resolution, the trial court entered summary judgment for the State, limiting, however, the penalty for violation of Section 106.08(5) to $35,000. Ferre appeals, and the State cross-appeals.

Ferre's claims here are identical to his claims in the court below, and we reject them in their entirety. Thus, we differ from the trial court having found that Ferre received and failed to return $35,000 in post-election contributions, it was required by Section 106.08(5),

[4]Section 106.08(5) provides:

"Any person who knowingly and willfully violates the provisions of this section shall, in addition to any other penalty prescribed by this chapter, pay to the state a sum equal to twice the amount contributed in violation of this chapter. Each campaign treasurer shall pay all amounts contributed in violation of this section to the state for deposit in the General Revenue Fund."

Florida Statutes (1981), to order Ferre to pay as a penalty a sum equal to twice the amount of the contributions, that is, $70,000, since such a penalty, in our view, is not unconstitutionally excessive.

[1] We assume for present purposes that the statutes prohibiting the acceptance, and requiring the return, of post-election contributions impact on rights guaranteed by the First Amendment to the United States Constitution,[5] that Ferre has standing to challenge their constitutionality,[6] and that they significantly limit First Amendment rights rather than merely regulate the time, place and manner of expression.[7] However, because even a significant

[5]The State contends that no First Amendment right is impacted, since the expression protected by the First Amendment is merely the "symbolic act of contributing," Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 21, 96 S.Ct. 612, 635, 46 L.Ed.2d 659, 689 (1976), which is no less symbolic where the contribution is returned rather than used by the candidate. Ferre says that there is no meaning, symbolic or otherwise, to a contribution where it is known at the outset that the contribution cannot be used by the candidate.

[6]Here the State contends that assuming constitutional rights could be said to be affected, the rights are those of the contributors, not the candidate. Ferre says that the rights of the contributor and the candidate are virtually inseparable.

[7]The State argues that a government may adopt reasonable time, place and manner regulations of expression and that the Florida Statutes under consideration do nothing more than limit the time within which contributions can be made and are reasonable. Ferre says the statutes in question impose a ban on contributions and as such prohibit, rather than delay, expression.

interference with the freedom of political association[8] will be sustained where the State, as here, "demonstrates a sufficiently important interest and means closely drawn to avoid unnecessary abridgement of associational freedoms," Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 25, 96 S.Ct. 612, 638 46 L.Ed.2d 659, 691 (1976); see also Cousins v. Wigoda, 419 U.S. 477, 488, 95 S.Ct. 541, 548, 42 L.Ed.2d 595, 604 (1975); NAACP v. Button, 371 U.S. 415, 438, 83 S.Ct. 328, 340, 9 L.Ed.2d 405, 421 (1963); Shelton v. Tucker, 364 U.S. 479, 488, 81 S.Ct. 247, 252, 5 L.Ed.2d 231, 237 (1960), we conclude that the statutes under attack are not unconstitutional.

What, then, are the sufficiently important or compelling state interests which are advanced by the statutes under consideration? The first, as should be obvious, is the prevention of corruption and the appearance of corruption. Surely, the Legislature could determine that a post-election contribution to a winning candidate could be a mere guise for paying the officeholder for a political favor. At the least, such a contribution, if not in fact corrupt, could be viewed by [8]In considering limitations on political contributions, "the primary First Amendment problem raised . . . is their restriction of one aspect of the contributor's freedom of political association." Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 24–25, 96 S.Ct. 612, 637, 46 L.Ed.2d 659, 691 (1976). The freedom of political association, "like free speech, lies at the foundation of a free society." Id. at 25, 96 S.Ct. at 637, 46 L.Ed.2d at 691; Shelton v. Tucker, 364 U.S. 479, 81 S.Ct. 247, 5 L.Ed.2d 231 (1960).

the public as corrupt.[9] As the United States Supreme Court recently noted in Federal Election Commission v. National Conservative Political Action Committee, ___ U.S. ___, ___, 105 S.Ct. 1459, 1469, 84 L.Ed.2d 455 (1985), "[t]he hallmark of corruption is the financial quid pro quo: dollars for political favors." Indeed, in Buckley v. Valeo, the Court solely relied on the governmental interest in preventing corruption and the appearance of corruption as its basis for upholding the limitations on the amount of contributions:

> "It is unnecessary to look beyond the Act's primary purpose—to limit the actuality and appearance of corruption resulting from large individual financial contributions—in order to find a constitutionally sufficient justification for the $1,000 contribution limitation . . . . To the extent that large contributions are given to secure political quid pro quos from current and potential office holders, the integrity of our system of representative democracy is undermined . . . .
> "Of almost equal concern as the danger of actual quid pro quo arrangements is the impact of the appearance of corruption stemming from [9]It could be argued that pre-election contributions are fraught with the same dangers. Of course, legislation is not rendered unconstitutional merely because it proscribes more narrowly rather than more broadly. There is, however, a rational distinction between a bet and a bet on a sure thing. As one wag put it: "Forecasting is very difficult, especially if it's about the future." Paul Dickson, The Official Rules (1978) (citing Fiedler's First Law of Forecasting).

---

public awareness of the opportunities for abuse inherent in financial contributions."

Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. at 26–27, 96 S.Ct. at 638–39, 46 L.Ed.2d at 692.

A second compelling governmental interest is the goal of allowing the public to be informed before an election of the identities of persons contributing to the campaign of a particular candidate. In the absence of the challenged statutes, a candidate could conceal the identity of supporters until after the election when it is too late for the revelation to be considered by the voters in casting their ballots.[10] Again, the State's interest in this regard, as recognized in Buckley v. Valeo, is significant:

"[D]isclosure provides the electorate with information 'as to where political campaign money comes from and how it is spent by the candidate' in order to aid the voters in evaluating those who seek federal office. It allows voters to place each candidate in the political spectrum more precisely than is often possible solely on the basis of party labels and campaign speeches. The sources of a [10]For example, if post-election contributions were allowed, a candidate could make large expenditures, secure in the knowledge that immediately after the election members of some currently unpopular group whose support for the candidate had not theretofore been disclosed would send in contributions to pay off the deficit. The result, of course, would be that voters may have been deceived into voting for a candidate with allegiances, or at least bedfellows, with which they violently disagree.

> candidate's financial support also alert the voter to the interests to which a candidate is most likely to be responsive and thus facilitate predictions of future performance in office."
> Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 66–67, 96 S.Ct. at 657, 46 L.Ed.2d at 715 (footnote omitted).

These compelling interests are recognized as being among the most fundamental interests that the government has in regulating the electoral process:

> "In the last two decades, Congress and almost all the States have passed laws regulating campaign financing. Analyzing these laws, commentators have delineated the following four legislative goals: stemming the rising costs of campaigns; maximizing the distribution to the public of information about the candidates; equalizing the opportunity of every aspirant to political office; and reducing the potential for corruption by large contributors. Theoretically, a law that achieves these four goals would be considered an ideal regulation of a privately or publicly financed electoral system."
> Moynahan, Florida's Campaign Finance Law: A Restoration of the Public's Confidence, 28 U.Fla.L.Rev. 458, 459 (1976) (footnotes omitted).

We think it clear that the challenged statutes are reasonably designed to maximize the distribution of information by allowing the public to be aware of a candidate's financial supporters at a time when such awareness can have an impact at the polls, and reduce the potential for corruption by removing the possibility of the giving of a post-election contribution in return for a political quid pro quo. When we weigh these compelling governmental interests against the minimal impact on First Amendment rights, we can only conclude that the regulations are not constitutionally infirm. Ferre, however, agrues that Sadowski v. Shevin, 345 So.2d 330 (Fla.1977), dictates a contrary result. There, the Florida Supreme Court invalidated a statute that precluded a candidate from making major political expenditures prior to qualifying for office.[11] We find Sadowski plainly distinguishable from the present case. First, the statute in Sadowski, being directed to expenditures, was a much more severe intrusion into First Amendment rights than are the present statutes. Indeed, this very distinction between expenditures, as in Sadowski, and limitations on contributions, as here, formed the basis for the Court in Buckley to find unconstitutional limits on expenditures by candidates, while upholding limits on contributions. See Federal Election Commission v. National Conservative Political Action Committee, 53 U.S.L.W. at 4296.

> "[A]lthough the Act's contribution and expenditure limitations both implicate fundamental First Amendment interests, its expenditure ceilings impose significantly more severe restrictions on protected freedoms of political expression and association than do its limitations on financial contributions."

[11]The effect in Sadowski was to prevent expenditures until the sixty-third day prior to the first primary.

424 U.S. at 23, 96 S.Ct. at 636, 46 L.Ed.2d at 690.

Second, none of the compelling governmental interests which support the statutes here under consideration were involved in Sadowski, and, indeed, the governmental interest advanced in support of the statute in Sadowski—to prevent less than serious candidates from seeking office—was found not to be served by the statute limiting expenditures.

Ferre also asserts that the governmental interests could be satisfied by less restrictive means. His argument here, however, is limited to the singular proposition that the goal of preventing corruption and the appearance of corruption can be achieved by less intrusive means. The argument ignores the other compelling governmental interest which justifies the statute.

We turn now to Ferre's contention that since Section 106.011(3)(a), Florida Statutes (1981), defines "contribution" as "[a] gift, subscription, conveyance, deposit, loan, payment, or distribution of money or anything of value . . . made for the purpose of influencing an election," money given after an election cannot constitute a contribution, as it cannot be given for the purpose of influencing an election that has already been held. We find no merit in this contention.

[2] Section 106.011, Florida Statutes, expressly provides that the terms it defines shall have the meanings set forth, "unless the context clearly indicates otherwise." The context in which the challenged statutes use the term "contribution" clearly indicates that the term includes post-election contributions.

[3–5] Sections 106.141 and 106.08 deal specifically with contributions received after an election. If the definition of "contribution" found in Section 106.011(3)(a) were used, Sections 106.141 and 106.08 would be nullities, since a contribution, according to the definition contained in Section 106.011(3)(a) could not be made after an election. Clearly, when the use of a statutory definition results in a manifest incongruity, as would be the case here, that definition should not be employed. See Lawson v. Suwanee Fruit and Steamship Co., 336 U.S. 198, 201, 69 S.Ct. 503, 504, 93 L.Ed. 611, 614–15 (1949). Rather, "the primary and overriding consideration in statutory interpretation is that a statute should be construed and applied so as to give effect to the evident intent of the legislature regardless of whether such construction varies from the statute's literal meaning." State v. Nunez, 368 So.2d 422, 423 (Fla. 3d DCA 1979). Even when strict construction of a statute is appropriate, "such strict construction is subordinate to the rule that the intention of the lawmakers must be given effect." State ex rel. Washington v. Rivkind, 350 So.2d 575, 577 (Fla. 3d DCA 1977). In the present context, there is little question that the legislature did not intend that the statutory definition of "contribution" be applied to the statutes under review, since such an application would plainly frustrate legislative intent and would, moreover, compel the absurd conclusion that the legislature meant to enact a statute that had no effect or meaning. It is, of course, a well settled principle that courts should avoid interpreting statutes in ways which ascribe to the legislature an intent to create an absurd result. See McKibben v. Mallory, 293 So.2d 48 (Fla.1974); City of St. Petersburg v. Siebold, 48 So.2d 291 (Fla.1950); Winter v. Playa del Sol, Inc., 353 So.2d 598 (Fla. 4th DCA 1977). See also Dickinson v. Davis, 224 So.2d 262, 264 (Fla.1969) ("It is never presumed that the Legislature intended to enact purposeless or useless legislation."), Allied Fidelity Ins. Co. v. State, 415 So.2d 109, 110–11 (Fla. 3d DCA 1982) ("[A]n axiom of statutory construction [is] that an interpretation of a statute which leads to an unreasonable or ridiculous conclusion or a result obviously not designed by the Legislature will not be adopted."). Therefore, because the context in which the term contribution is used in Sections 106.141 and 106.08 requires a different meaning than that set forth in Section 106.011(3)(a), a contribution need not be made for the purpose of influencing an election in order for a violation of Sections 106.141 or 106.08 to be found.

Lastly, we consider the State's contention on its cross-appeal that the trial court, having found that Ferre received and failed to return $35,000 of contributions, erred in not imposing a $70,000 penalty under Section 106.08(5). The statute provides:

> "Any person who knowingly and willfully violates the provisions of this section shall, in addition to any other penalty prescribed by this chapter, pay to the State a sum equal to twice the amount contributed in violation of this chapter. Each campaign treasurer shall pay all amounts contributed in violation of this section to the State for deposit in the General Revenue Fund."

[6] Without dispute, this provision is mandatory in nature, since the word "shall," when used in such a statute, carries such a connotation. See Neal v. Bryant, 149 So.2d 529 (Fla.1962); Florida Tallow v. Bryan, 237 So.2d 308 (Fla. 4th DCA 1970). The trial court, however, finding that "the mandatory imposition of the penalty as requested by the State, as applied to the facts in this case, would be unreasonably harsh and oppressive and would bear no reasonable relationship to the offense committed or the wrong sought to be redressed," imposed a civil penalty against defendant in the amount of $35,000, the exact amount of money unlawfully accepted by defendant.

[7] Ferre does not contend that the provision is not mandatory. Instead, he argues that the imposition of such a fine would be unconstitutionally excessive. We think, however, that when the fine imposed is, as it was below, an amount equal to the amount of money unlawfully accepted and retained, the fine does no more than put the defendant in the same position as he would have been in had he not violated the law. In essence, then, such a penalty is not a penalty at all. In contrast, the penalty provided for by statute of a sum equal to twice the amount of money unlawfully accepted and retained clearly bears a rational relationship to the statutory violation as it increases in direct relation the amount of money unlawfully accepted and retained.

[8] In Amos v. Gunn, 84 Fla. 285, 364, 94 So. 615, 641 (1922) (on rehearing), the court announced that a fine is not "excessive in violation of the Constitution unless it is plainly and undoubtedly in excess of any reasonable requirements for redressing the wrong." Clearly, the fine here is not in excess of any reasonable requirement for redressing the wrong. Indeed, the constitutional propriety of a fine that doubles the amount of money involved in the violation of a law has already been recognized. In Baeumel v. State, 26 Fla. 71, 7 So. 371 (1890), the plaintiff in error was found to have sold spirituous, vinous and malt liquors without having paid a required license tax of $300.00. The law set the penalty for such a violation "at not less than double the amount required for such license." 26 Fla. at 74, 7 So. at 372. The trial court imposed a fine of $900.00. On appeal, the court stated:

> "Under the statute, the judge could not fine the accused less than double the tax required for a license to sell spirituous, vinous, and malt liquors, $600; but he could impose a fine in excess of that amount, provided the fine imposed did not violate the bill of rights, which prohibits 'excessive' fines. In the case of Frese v. State, 23 Fla. 267, 2 South. Rep. 1, it is held that a fine of $900, under the same statute that the plaintiff in error was convicted under, was not excessive; and we so hold in this case."
> 26 Fla. at 77, 7 So. at 373.

[9] Surely, if a statute requiring a minimum fine of twice the amount of money involved in an unlawful act is proper, and if, under that statute, fines that triple the amount of money are upheld, there can be no question that the statute here does not require the imposition of an excessive fine under the Florida Constitution.[12]

For the reasons given, the judgment of the case is remanded to the trial court to modify the penalty of $35,000 to $70,000, and, as modified, the judgment is affirmed.

Affirmed in part; reversed in part, and remanded with directions to modify the penalty.

[12]Nor does the mandatory penalty violate the separation of powers clause of the Florida Constitution. See Art. II, § 3, Fla. Const. The power to impose fines is not judicial in nature. It is a "discretionary power of the law-making department . . . to redress wrongs," and the power "is limited only by the organic provisions requiring due process and equal protection of the laws to be observed and forbidding excessive fines to be imposed." Amos v. Gunn, 84 Fla. 285, 363, 94 So. 615, 641 (1922) (on rehearing). See 36A C.J.S. Fines § 2 (1961) ("Subject to constitutional restriction, the imposition and regulation of fines rests within the discretion of the legislature."). The general proposition that a mandatory minimum prison sentence "that has been established by the legislature and is not on its face cruel and unusual . . . will be sustained as against attacks based on due process, equal protection, separation of powers and legislative usurpation arguments," Scott v. State, 369 So.2d 330, 331 (Fla.1979), is, a fortiori, applicable to a mandatory minimum monetary penalty.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

Petitioner was at all times relevant to this case the mayor of the City of Miami. Following his reelection to office on November 10, 1981, Petitioner accepted and retained $35,000.00 in $1,000.00 post-election contributions. The contributions were obtained for Petitioner by one Ben Leon, Jr.

On November 3, 1983, the State filed a civil complaint against Petitioner and his deputy campaign manager, Maria C. Petit, alleging violations of Chapter 106 of the Florida Statutes, dealing with campaign financing. Subsequently, an amended complaint was filed. The amended complaint charged that Petitioner violated Florida Statutes §106.141(10) by accepting the $35,000.00 in contributions and that Petitioner violated Florida Statutes §106.08(2) by not returning the contributions. The complaint asked that the trial court enter an order assessing civil penalties in the amount of $1,000.00 for the violation of Florida Statutes §106.141(10) and, as provided in Florida Statutes §106.08(5), in the amount of $70,000.00, a sum equal to twice the amount of contributions unlawfully accepted and not returned, for the violation of Florida Statutes §106.08(2).

Petitioner, by means of motion to dismiss, motion to strike and answer and affirmative defenses, challenged the constitutionality of Florida Statutes §§106.08(2) and 106.141(10). Other issues not dealt with by the present petition were also raised by Petitioner.

The court denied Petitioner's motion to dismiss and reserved ruling on the motion to strike. The State moved for summary judgment and the motion was granted. The trial court found Florida Statutes §§106.08(2) and 106.141(10) constitutional. The court imposed a $1,000.00 penalty for the violation of Florida Statutes §106.141(10). As for the violation of Florida Statutes §106.08(2), the court imposed a penalty of $35,000.00. A final judgment was entered reflecting these conclusions.

Petitioner appealed and the State cross-appealed. Florida's Third District Court of Appeal upheld the trial court's conclusion that the statutes were constitutional and affirmed the judgment against Petitioner. On the State's cross-appeal, the court found that the trial court erred in not imposing a $70,000.00 fine for the violation of Florida Statutes §106.08(2). Ferre v. State ex rel. Reno, 478 So.2d 1077 (Fla. 3rd DCA 1985).

Petitioner obtained discretionary review in the Supreme Court of Florida. That court approved and adopted the opinion of the district court of appeal. Ferre v. State, 494 So.2d 214 (Fla. 1986).

This proceeding follows.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

There are numerous reasons why this Court should deny the petition for writ of certiorari.

The challenged statutes, which do nothing more than regulate the time that political candidates can receive campaign contributions, do not impact on constitutional rights since they do not interfere with the symbolic act of contributing. Moreover, since their only effect is to regulate the time for the acceptance of contributions, it is clear that even if they are deemed to impact on constitutional rights, it need only be shown that they constitute reasonable regulations in order for them to be deemed constitutional.

Thus, Petitioner's asserted reasons for arguing in support of jurisdiction, since they are predicated upon the need for a showing of a compelling governmental interest, are not appropriate matters to even consider.

Likewise, since the rights involved in campaign contributions are the rights of contributors, Petitioner, a candidate, lacks standing to raise his present claims, and for this reason also, Petitioner's asserted reasons for granting jurisdiction should not even be reached.

In any event, there exist interests that satisfy even the compelling governmental interest test.

One of these interests is the prevention of corruption and the appearance of corruption. This interest has been previously recognized as compelling by this Court. Petitioner's claim that the statutes should distinguish between large and small contributions has been waived by his failure to raise it in any lower court, is a matter of legislative, not constitutional, concern, and is without merit in light of the fact that Florida limits all contributions, regardless of when they are received.

The statutes also serve the purpose of informing the voters before an election of the identity of a candidate's contributors. This interest has also been recognized previously by this Court. The statutes under review prevent candidates from hiding the identity of unpopular supporters by simply waiting to accept contributions from such supporters until it is too late for the electorate to learn their identity.

With regard to both interests, Petitioner fails to demonstrate that the issues he raises will have any impact beyond the present case or that any confusion exists in the law. Moreover, Petitioner has not shown any basis to believe that the conclusions reached by the state courts of Florida are in any way incorrect. Thus, there is no reason to accept jurisdiction.

QUESTION PRESENTED FOR REVIEW (RESTATED)

WHETHER THIS COURT SHOULD GRANT JURISDICTION TO CONSIDER THE CONSTITUTIONALITY OF FLORIDA STATUTES §§106.141(10) AND 106.08(2), WHICH DO NO MORE THAN REGULATE THE TIME WHEN POLITICAL CANDIDATES CAN ACCEPT CAMPAIGN CONTRIBUTIONS, WHEN THERE CLEARLY EXIST COMPELLING GOVERNMENTAL INTERESTS, EVEN THOUGH IN ORDER FOR THE STATUTES TO BE DEEMED CONSTITUTIONAL, IT NEED ONLY BE DETERMINED THAT THEY CONSTITUTE A REASONABLE REGULATION OF TIME OF EXPRESSION?

ARGUMENT

The statutes in question in the present case regulate the time for the acceptance and retention by political candidates of campaign contributions. Specifically, insofar as relevant to the present case, the statutes make it unlawful to accept and retain contributions after an election.[1] They do not in any way limit the amount of contributions, nor do they in any way restrict the source of contributions.

LACK OF STANDING

Likewise, it should be realized that the statutes do not regulate the making of

(1) Florida Statutes §106.141(10) precludes a candidate from accepting contributions after the candidate has withdrawn his candidacy, been eliminated as a candidate or elected to office. Florida Statutes §106.08(2) requires candidates to return contributions received after the above noted events, as well as contributions received on the day of an election or less than five days prior to an election. The portion of the statute relating to contributions received on the day of an election or less than five days prior to an election is not at issue in the present case, in that Petitioner was charged only with the acceptance and retention of contributions received after an election.

contributions, only their acceptance and retention. Thus, the statutes do not affect the rights of contributors. Since the First Amendment right involved in the making of a contribution is that of the contributor, Petitioner, a candidate, not a contributor, lacks standing to challenge the statutes' constitutionality. It is well-settled that the constitutionality of a statute may properly be raised only by a person whose constitutional rights are affected by the statute. See Barrows v. Jackson, 346 U.S. 249, 73 S.Ct. 1031, 97 L.Ed. 1586 (1953). Therefore, this is not an appropriate case for review of the challenged statutes.(2)

LACK OF IMPACT ON CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS

Because the statutes involved in the present case do not restrict the making of contributions by

(2) The Florida appellate court declined to reach the standing question in light of its conclusion that the statutes were constitutional. Ferre v. State ex rel. Reno, 478 So.2d 1077, 1079 (Fla. 3d DCA 1985).

a contributor, but only their acceptance and retention by candidates, it is apparent that they do not impact on constitutionally protected rights. In Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 21, 96 S.Ct. 612, 635, 46 L.Ed.2d 659, 689 (1976), this Court stated:

> A contribution serves as a general expression of support for the candidate and his views, but does not communicate the underlying basis for the support. The quantity of communication by the contributor does not increase perceptibly with the size of his contribution, since the expression rests solely on the undifferentiated, symbolic act of contributing.

Since the expression protected by the First Amendment is merely "the symbolic act of contributing," the challenged statutes do no impact at all on the right. The symbolic act is equally symbolic whether the contribution is returned or converted to the candidate's own use. The contributor in either instance has expressed his beliefs by aligning himself symbolically with his chosen candidate. While a requirement that contributions be returned has a practical impact on a candidate, it does not impact on constitutional rights. Thus, there is no need to consider whether the statutes are supported by a sufficient governmental interest and certiorari should be denied.[3]

REASONABLE REGULATION OF TIME OF EXPRESSION

This Court has made it very clear that "the government may adopt reasonable time, place and manner regulations of expression which do not discriminate against speakers or ideas, in order to further an important governmental interest unrelated to the restriction of communication." Buckley v. Valeo, supra, 424 U.S. at 18, 96 S.Ct. at 634, 46 L.Ed.2d at 687 (1976). See also

(3) The Florida appellate court did not reach the question of whether constitutional rights were impacted in light of its finding that compelling governmental interests exist regardless of the constitutional impact. Ferre v. State ex rel. Reno, 478 So.2d 1077, 1079 (Fla. 3d DCA 1985).

Consolidated Edison Company v. Public Service Commission, 447 U.S. 529, 100 S.Ct. 2326, 65 L.Ed.2d 319 (1980); Erznoznik v. City of Jacksonville, 422 U.S. 205, 95 S.Ct. 2268, 45 L.Ed.2d 125 (1975); Adderly v. Florida, 385 U.S. 39, 87 S.Ct. 242, 17 L.Ed.2d 149 (1966); Cox v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 559, 85 S.Ct. 476, 13 L.Ed.2d 487 (1965); Kovacs v. Cooper, 336 U.S. 77, 69 S.Ct. 448, 93 L.Ed. 513 (1949).

It is thus clear that Petitioner's discussion of whether there exists a compelling governmental interest to support the statutes does not deal with a relevant question and does not present a reason to grant certiorari.(4)

(4) The Florida appellate court found that it was not necessary to consider whether to apply a test of reasonableness in that the governmental interests were so strong as to meet even the compelling interest test urged by Petitioner. Ferre v. State ex rel. Reno, 478 So.2d 1077, 1079 (Fla. 3d DCA 1985).

COMPELLING INTEREST

As noted in footnotes two, three and four, the Florida appellate court did not reach the matters previously discussed in this brief in light of its conclusion that there exist two compelling governmental interests supporting the challenged statutes. These interests are the prevention of corruption and the appearance of corruption and the goal of allowing the public to be informed before an election of the identities of persons contributing to the campaign of a particular candidate.

Informing the Public and Disclosure Requirements

In arguing that this Court should accept jurisdiction, Petitioner initially asserts that the goal of allowing the public to be informed before the election of the identity of a candidate's contributors has not been held by this Court to be a compelling interest.

This Court, however, has recognized the legitimacy of such an interest in upholding disclosure requirements. Buckley v Valeo, supra, 424 U.S. at 66-67, 96 S.Ct. at 657, 46 L.Ed.2d at 715. To allow a candidate to accept post-election contributions would be to allow a candidate to conceal from the electorate's evaluation the identity of unpopular supporters by having them defer their contributions until after an election.(5) Thus, the statutes here apply an interest previously identified by this Court to regulate the time in which contributions can be made in order to avoid the emasculation of clearly constitutional disclosure requirements. Therefore, this Court has at least implicitly found the

(5) Florida law requires candidates to disclose the identities of all contributors. Florida Statutes §106.07.

interest identified by the Florida appellate court to be compelling.[6]

Even assuming, however, that this Court has not so found, it is beyond dispute that this Court has never rejected the conclusion of the Florida appellate court. Moreover, Petitioner has failed to point to any decision of any court in this country that has rejected the conclusion.

Thus, this case does not present a situation in which the law is confused or in which a decision by this Court would have more than a limited impact on one state's statutes. Further, Petitioner has demonstrated no basis to believe that the decision of the Florida appellate court is in any way incorrec

(6) Petitioner's reliance on Federal Election Commission v. National Conservative Political Action Committee, ____ U.S. ____, 105 S.Ct. 1459, 84 L.Ed.2d 455 (1985) is misplaced. That case dealt with limitations on campaign expenditures and the portion of the opinion quoted by Petitioner was written in that context. Limiting expenditures is obviously a much greater intrusion into constitutional rights than are the regulations imposed by the challenged statutes here. Buckley v. Valeo, supra.

This Court should decline to accept jurisdiction.

Prevention of Corruption and the Appearance of Corruption

In Buckley v. Valeo, supra, this Court found the prevention of corruption and the appearance of corruption to be a sufficiently compelling interest to allow the government to limit the amount of money an individual can contribute to a candidate, noting that such a limitation entails only a marginal restriction upon the contributor's ability to engage in free communication. 424 U.S. at 20-21, 96 S.Ct. at 635, 46 L.Ed.2d at 688-689. Obviously, a restriction on when an individual can contribute to a candidate involves an even less than marginal restriction on that ability.

If the prevention of corruption and the appearance of corruption constituted a compelling interest sufficient to uphold the restrictions in Buckley v. Valeo, there can be no question that the less intrusive restrictions of the statutes here are also constitutional and that there is no need for review by this Court.

Petitioner points to the fact that the statutes deal with both large and small contributions. This fact is immaterial. Florida limits the size of all contributions, regardless of when they are made. Florida Statutes §106.08(1). Thus, it would serve little purpose to distinguish among the size of contributions that are already limited to a relatively small amount.(7) Moreover, the threshhold amount of money involved in campaign limitations is a matter of legislative discretion, Buckley v. Valeo, supra, 424 U.S. at 83, 96 S.Ct. at 665, 46 L.Ed.2d at 724, and thus hardly a matter upon which to base jurisdiction. Finally, as noted with regard to the government's interest in informing the electorate of the

(7) Petitioner accepted 35 separate unlawful contributions, each of which was for the maximum amount allowed by law, so it is doubtful that this matter is an appropriate one to be considered in the present case in any event. It should also be realized that Petitioner did not raise this claim in any lower court and has therefore waived his right to have it considered.

identity of a candidate's supporters, Petitioner's claims deal with an area of limited impact in which there is no conflict of opinions anywhere in the country and present no basis to believe that the Florida appellate court was incorrect. Plainly, Petitioner has failed to set forth a basis for the granting of certiorari.
